Scientists map gene flaws linked to lung cancer

WASHINGTON, D.C. (AP) — Scientists have mapped a series of gene flaws that appear to be linked to lung cancer, a discovery that could lead to new treatments and a better understanding of the disease. The findings, published in the journal Science, show that a series of mutations in a gene called TP53 can lead to the development of lung cancer. The TP53 gene is one of the most commonly mutated genes in cancer, and it is thought to play a key role in preventing the growth of abnormal cells. The study found that the mutations in the TP53 gene were more frequent in lung cancer than in other types of cancer, suggesting that the gene plays a particularly important role in the development of lung cancer. The researchers also found that the mutations in the TP53 gene were more frequent in lung cancer than in other types of cancer, suggesting that the gene plays a particularly important role in the development of lung cancer.
